Test Four.

I am going to give you the instructions for this test. I shall introduce each part of the test and give you time to look at the questions. At the start of each piece you will hear this sound:

tone

You will hear each piece twice.

Remember, while you are listening, write your answers on the question paper. You will have five minutes at the end of the test to copy your answers onto the separate answer sheet.

There will now be a pause. Please ask any questions now, because you must not speak during the test.

[pause]

Now open your question paper and look at Part One.

[pause]

PART 1

You will hear people talking in eight different situations. For questions 1 to 8, choose the best answer (A, B or C).

Question 1

You hear an actress talking about her new part in a play.

[pause]

tone

Woman: I think it's a great show, which gives the audience a fantastic night out. There are plenty of laughs, but there are also moments when the audience will gasp at what they see. It's such a great part for a woman of my age and there aren't many of those about. My character, the mother, finds her loyalties divided within the family. It's powerful stuff and that's why I jumped at the chance of playing her. The male lead is played by Sam Yates. I've worked closely with him before on TV, but it'll be fun for both of us to see if we can re-create the chemistry between us on stage.

[pause]

tone

[The recording is repeated.]

Question 2

You hear two friends talking about a restaurant.

[pause]

tone

Woman: Well, they've really changed that place, haven't they? The first time we went, it was like going back in time – and not in a good way!

Man: And the menu wasn't very inspiring then either. I was surprised when you suggested going there again actually.

Woman: Well, I heard it was under new management and had improved, and I just wanted to see what they'd done. It certainly seems to be working. There were people waiting for tables this time and the staff could hardly keep up. They were rushed off their feet.

Man: I felt sorry for them. They need to take on more people.

Question 3 You hear two students talking about a visit to a museum.

[pause]

tone

Woman: I must say I don't always enjoy tours of museum galleries, but I thought the guide was really good, didn't you?

Man: Well yeah, I mean luckily ancient Egypt is a fascinating topic, so he already had our interest before he even opened his mouth. But I agree he was great, and clearly very familiar with all the objects in the gallery – he could probably have spent the whole time talking about just one or two of them.

Woman: I'm glad he didn't though!

Man: I know – there were so many different things to see – but it would've been good to have the chance to ask more questions, wouldn't it?

Woman: Yes, you're right.

[pause]

tone

[The recording is repeated.]

[pause]

Question 4 You hear talk given by a child psychologist.

[pause]

tone

Woman: Parental restrictions on outdoor play have considerable consequences for children's health and future well-being. Kids should have space to explore and run around. Also, playing in the dirt seems to strengthen the immune system; in other words, it stimulates the body's defences. If you restrict outdoor play, you also restrict stimulation of the immune system. The system then responds inappropriately to stimuli, and that probably explains the rise in allergies such as asthma. Without free outdoor play, kids lack the ability to get together and play spontaneously. Playing freely with others lets kids develop their social skills, and when free play is denied, so are those opportunities.

[pause]

tone

[The recording is repeated.]

[pause]

Question 5 You hear part of a radio phone-in discussion about a proposal to redevelop one part of a city.

[pause]

tone

Woman: We're discussing the recently announced proposal to demolish the old athletics stadium in the city and build three new apartment blocks on the site. Our next caller is Dennis.

Man: Hi. A couple of questions came to me about this proposal. How many people from the area could really afford a flat in the kind of buildings the developers have in mind? And, while it might seem ridiculous to question the idea of creating a green space planted with trees around the site, would young people be able to use it for sports and other activities or would it be intended – as seems likely – for the occupants of the new luxury blocks?

[pause]

tone

[The recording is repeated.]

[pause]

Question 6 You hear two people talking on the radio about an exhibition of work by a wildlife photographer.

[pause]

tone

Man: I expected the photos to be of animals in the wild rather than with all the natural background taken out. It made for a powerful effect without the details that a lot of photographers tend to be interested in.

Woman: They were all shot in that style so you focused on the animals themselves. I guess that was his intention as a photographer – to force you to observe their faces.

Man: There's little doubt about that. He's trying to draw attention to sadness at the loss of their natural environment. Quite depressing. Those ones of the gorillas all had that same effect on me.

Man: Avoiding the standard settings for wildlife shots had stunning results.

Test 4 answer key

Question 7 You hear a man telling a colleague about a workshop he will attend.

[pause]

tone

Woman: So you're off to that workshop, I see.

Man: I think the workshop is going to be quite hard work actually. You're allowed to attend on condition that you've done some preparation for it. I've read a few articles by the main presenters – just because I was interested – it wasn't a requirement. And I've heard a series of podcasts. They sent us a link to those in the pre-course information email. We need to do that beforehand so we get the best out of the day. During the workshop we're encouraged to take notes and raise any issues that concern us, but we can't film or take photos.

[pause]

tone

[The recording is repeated.]

[pause]

Question 8 You hear two friends talking about the football team they support.

[pause]

tone

Woman: So, we won again last night.

Man: Yeah, I watched it on TV. I've seen many more entertaining matches than that, but at least we didn't lose.

Woman: Apparently, the manager had another row with some newspaper reporters. They asked him why he hadn't selected certain players for the match, and he said it was none of their business. He was quite rude, I think.

Man: Well, it gives reporters something to write about, so I doubt if they're bothered really. The fact is, though, that the team haven't been at all exciting to watch recently, and that's the manager's responsibility. He isn't interested in exciting footballers – winning's everything for him, which is a pity.

tone

[The recording is repeated.]

That is the end of Part One.

Now turn to Part Two.

PART 2

You will hear a man called Victor Medway talking to some students about his job, helping to organise a music festival. For questions 9 to 18, complete the sentences with a word or short phrase.

You now have forty-five seconds to look at Part Two.

[pause]

tone

Hello. My name's Victor Medway and I'm responsible for planning and organising music festivals.

So, how did I come to be in this line of work? I've actually had a passion for music since my early teens, and my dream was to be a DJ on the radio. Alternatively, I wanted to be the producer of radio programmes. I never managed to land that kind of job, but I did end up as a research assistant on radio shows. I enjoyed that for a while and it gave me some useful experience.

But after a couple of years I wanted to try something different and my friend suggested volunteering at a music festival. In exchange for free entry to the festival, you work for a few hours each day. For example, a volunteer might help out by providing first aid or handing out bottles of water. I started by cleaning up during a festival. After four days of that, I decided I'd try and get a paid job with a music festival, and I got lucky.

So just to give you an idea of what my job is like, at the moment I'm booking the acts for a summer festival called Wavelength. This year, we'll have about eighty acts in total. We'll be opening with Antimatter, the electronic dance music act, while the final-day headliners are the rock legends, Ghost. Earlier this week, I managed to persuade a world-famous heavy metal band – I'm not allowed to name them yet – to appear on day two.

The first Wavelength festival took place ten years ago, and it's grown enormously since then. In the first year, about 5,000 people turned up. Now, based on ticket applications, we reckon we could attract around 75,000 over the four days, although the size of the venue restricts us to 35,000. Tickets for this year are sold out, by the way.

Wavelength has changed in other ways over the years. The facilities are better than they were, and the whole operation is run with greater efficiency. In the past, Wavelength was often accused of not having enough diversity – too many acts looked and sounded the same. We still get comments like that but there's nothing really to justify them now. This year's line-up has music to suit all tastes.

Also, while music is still the main focus of Wavelength, with four different stages for it, we do cater for other interests. We have a large tent for comedy acts each year, and this time round we've got people performing live poetry – something we've never had before. We even have a tent where circus performers entertain festival-goers.

I spend lots of time keeping track of the music scene globally. It's important to have the latest information about things like album releases and bands' touring schedules. I also go to music festivals around the world, mainly because of the inspiration I get there – seeing different ways of presenting music, for example, or certain musicians who I might end up booking for Wavelength.

Test 4 answer key

Of course, every organiser wants their own festival to get the best acts and the biggest crowds, so there's competition between them. When it comes to festivals with similar musical profiles, there's often a particular rivalry. But I actually talk a lot to other festival organisers and over time a network has formed, which has been very useful for sharing information and advice.

I have contact with other music industry people too. Musicians themselves can be unpredictable, but once you get to know them, they're usually fine. Their agents – the people you make bookings with – are often quite awkward to deal with. You'd think they'd jump at the publicity that festival appearances can give their clients. Musicians' managers are often demanding too, but you can understand why – their role is to protect their acts.

To succeed as a festival organiser, you need to be persuasive, and, fortunately, I have pretty effective communication skills – something I was born with, I guess. It's also important to be good at administration, and I've had to make a big effort to achieve that. A love of music definitely helps too, though you don't have to be a musician – my musical skills are very limited.

PART 3

You will hear five short extracts in which people are talking about a cookery course they participated in. For questions 19 to 23, choose from the list (A to H) what each speaker liked best about the course. Use the letters only once. There are three extra letters which you do not need to use.

You now have thirty seconds to look at Part Three.

Speaker 1

My mother paid for me and my sister to do a cake-making course. Our class had the teacher's undivided and expert attention, along with her two assistants, for the morning, making four cakes using the traditional ingredients. The teacher really knew her stuff. When it came to baking, I got to grips with some really clever tricks of the trade, and that was really valuable for me. We'd tried making the same cakes before – although they'd never worked out, but under her expert guidance, we managed to produce some very professional-looking cakes. They even tasted good too! My Mom was very impressed. She thought we'd popped into a shop on the way home and bought them!

[pause]

Speaker 2

The chef, Stefan, was very enthusiastic and had a great sense of humour, which is very important when you have such a diverse group of students. The kitchen was well equipped, although the two cookers were pretty ancient, and we had to provide our own ingredients. We all got to decide what dish we wanted to cook, and there were some very interesting ideas. In the end, mine seemed to be the one everyone wanted to taste. The high spot of the course, though, was just spending time with my fellow students – sitting down around a big table and chatting about our dishes.

[pause]

Speaker 3

I'm a vegetarian and I booked a course on vegetarian cooking as a way of increasing the range of recipes I can prepare. The day was extremely well organised. Our instructor John was incredibly knowledgeable and if you wanted advice about anything, he would willingly give it to you. There were only six students, which meant we all got plenty of help and all got involved in each other's cooking experience ... although some people didn't know when to hold back. I now have exactly what I wanted – a variety of dishes that allows me to meet my own dietary needs as well as keep a hungry family satisfied. What more could you want?

[pause]

Speaker 4

The class was limited to 12 students, with plenty of preparation space for each person. Each day we were given a set of recipes, each revolving around a theme. There was, quite rightly, a real emphasis on sourcing good quality produce straight from the fields, which I particularly appreciated. You could certainly taste the difference in the finished dish! The teacher was always available when you needed her. I really felt I was in good hands. If you got stuck on some of the more technical bits, she was always more than happy to fully explain the problem, addressing the entire class, so we really learnt as a group.

As a parent, I'm always looking for activities that will stimulate and educate my children rather than simply entertain them, so I signed us all up for a cookery course. The kids really enjoyed experimenting with chocolate recipes – they came up with some crazy ideas for dishes, but what really made it for me was getting to use the state-of-the-art cooker. I could never have afforded anything like that at home. The challenge of making such delicious recipes really stretched us all, but when you're using the most up-to-date things available, everything seems much simpler. The teacher was so patient and really knew her stuff. I'd definitely take the kids on one of these again.

PART 4

You will hear an interview with Terry Bankcroft, whose company, Get Running, organises overseas marathons, talking about his work. For questions 24 to 30, choose the best answer (A, B or C).

You now have one minute to look at Part Four.

[pause]

tone

Interviewer: Terry, thank you for coming to speak to us today about your business called Get Running. Now, you organise marathons all over the world. How did you get into running in the first place?

Terry: Well, I had a successful career sitting in front of a computer, creating websites and designing apps. Then I met my wife and we discovered that we were both creative types who'd done a lot of running when we were younger. But as time went by, work and stuff had taken over. Jenny started running again about eight years ago. I didn't jump on the bandwagon straightaway, but I cheered her on from the side-lines! Her passion and energy were infectious and I took up running again.

Interviewer: Are you still as keen on running now as you were then?

Terry: Back then, when I started, it seemed like a lot of hard work and there's no denying it – it was painful! But as my endurance increased, I moved on from short distances and then I started competing. I don't think I'll ever stop – I can't imagine not doing it. It's led on to other things too. Now I mountain-bike, snowboard, ski – I'll try most things. I've become a more active all-round athlete.

Interviewer: Now, you organise international running events. What aspect do you find most challenging?

Terry: The planning is very time consuming. We spend months recruiting staff and volunteers, handling the advertising and promotion, and the logistics. Runners don't see all that and often query the cost of entry to the race. Having to explain that is the worst part for me. Another tricky bit is co-ordinating with government officials in the area. Cultural differences can cause misunderstandings, so I hand that part over to our local staff and I don't get involved.

Interviewer: You organise races in some interesting parts of the world. How do you choose the locations?

Terry: It's my own preference really. I've run all types of races and the ones I really remember are where I've gone off the beaten track and into nature. It's something magical to experience that. We chose our latest race site when we were on holiday in this amazing, lush region of China. I love taking the runners off the touristy path, into breathtakingly beautiful but remote locations.

Interviewer: You make good use of local volunteers to help run your races.

Terry: Yes, volunteers are the key to successful athletic events. It's a huge task to stage a race; the list of responsibilities we ask the volunteers to undertake is endless. In some respects, the runners are the stars of the show, but I make sure that the volunteers also get their moment in the spotlight too. Most of them are runners themselves, so they get a big kick out of helping out the competitors.

Interviewer: Now, tell me about the package tour side of what you do.

Test 4 answer key

Terry: Yes, well, I organise the races, often with the assistance of a local partner organisation in the country concerned, but also I organise tours for the many runners who take part from overseas. They're responsible for their flights, but after that I take over ... transporting them to and from the race site by coach.
I provide two nights' lodging, all meals and a separate sightseeing trip.

Interviewer: Now, on the running side, what advice would you give to a first-time runner in one of your events?

Terry: Well, don't get carried away in the excitement and go off too fast, only to run out of energy later. Also, just focus on your own running form and on giving your own best performance as well as you can. You can't control things like the weather, the other participants, possible injuries ... anything can happen. You mustn't let thoughts of these things distract you.

Now you will hear Part Four again.

That is the end of Part Four.

There will now be a pause of five minutes for you to copy your answers onto the separate answer sheet. Be sure to follow the numbering of all the questions. I shall remind you when there is one minute left, so that you are sure to finish in time.

[pause – four minutes]

You have one more minute left.

[pause – one minute]

That is the end of the test. Please stop now. Your supervisor will now collect all the question papers and answer sheets.
