

Test 3 answer key

Reading and Use of English

Part 1

1 C 2 A 3 D 4 A 5 B 6 A 7 C 8 D

Answer key
with extra explanations in Resource Bank

Part 2

9 herself 10 make 11 took 12 so
13 Not 14 Since 15 how 16 which

Part 3

17 temptation 18 basic 19 presence 20 emotional
21 observation(s) 22 discovery 23 strengths 24 independent

Part 4

25 he had / he'd | SET off / out
26 IF I hadn't / had not | spoken / talked
27 got to | CATCH up on / with
28 is / 's going to / will BE | finished / ready
29 was ACCUSED of | making / having made
30 MUST have / 've | taken

Part 5

31 D 32 C 33 B 34 B 35 C 36 B

Part 6

37 C 38 E 39 G 40 A 41 F 42 D

Part 7

43 B 44 C 45 C 46 A 47 B 48 A 49 D 50 C 51 B 52 D

Listening

Part 1

1 C 2 A 3 A 4 A 5 B 6 B 7 A 8 B

Answer key
with extra explanations in Resource Bank

Part 2

9 travel 10 check facts 11 celebrities / celebs
12 adverts / ads / advertisements 13 firefighter / fire(-)fighter 14 kindness
15 cycle path 16 (a) musical 17 (a) lecture hall 18 (doing) research

Part 3

19 H 20 B 21 E 22 C 23 F

Part 4

24 C 25 B 26 A 27 C 28 B 29 B 30 C

Audioscript Test Three

I am going to give you the instructions for this test.

I shall introduce each part of the test and give you time to look at the questions. At the start of each piece you will hear this sound: [tone]

You will hear each piece twice.

Remember, while you are listening, write your answers on the question paper. You will have five minutes at the end of the test to copy your answers onto the separate answer sheet.

There will now be a pause. Please ask any questions now, because you must not speak during the test.

Part One.

For each question, choose the correct answer.

PART 1

Question 1 You hear two friends talking about a video of a news item on the girl's phone.

Girl: I must find this video on my phone to show you. It's hilarious. There's this TV news reporter and a parrot ...

Boy: ... I've seen it. The bird lands on the reporter's shoulder while he's addressing the camera and flies off with one of his earbuds. The reporter looks ridiculous!

Girl: Well, he was surprised. What was brilliant for me, was that he was commenting on the increase in thefts in the area!

Boy: A perfect illustration of his point. But the parrot must've been taught to do that by the TV crew.

Girl: I doubt it. At least he eventually got his earbud back.

Boy: Mmm. The parrot lost interest and dropped it.

Question 2 You hear a girl telling a friend about her plan to do a summer course on e-gaming.

Girl: I've enrolled on an e-games course for a week during the summer holidays.

Boy: I didn't know there was such a thing. It's great that you're giving it a try.

Girl: Yeah. They call it a camp, but you actually do it online at home. There are a number of group activities you can do, as well as having one-to-one coaching. It's supposed to be great for developing your in-game skills. I can't wait.

Boy: Sounds like it should be just the thing for you. Though you're awesome already when it comes to gaming.

Girl: Oh, I expect I'll be bottom of the class.

Boy: I doubt that. Anyway, I envy you. It sounds really cool. I expect you'll beat me all the time from now on.

Question 3 You hear two friends talking about a science experiment.

Girl: Did you do an experiment in science today?

Boy: Yeah, a brilliant one about density of liquids.

Girl: Where you pour different fruit juices into a test tube and get layers of different colours? We did that last term.

Boy: Yeah. The sweetest juice goes to the bottom. We had to choose three types of juice from a whole range, including unusual things like cranberry and pomegranate – and then discuss what we thought'd happen. My group opted for contrasting colours – blackcurrant, white grape and orange – so we got a great effect. It was fun guessing, though we got the layers wrong. We thought the grape'd rise to the top, but it stayed at the bottom.

Question 4 You hear a girl telling a friend about her first surfing lesson.

Girl: I've just had my first surfing lesson.

Boy: How was it?!

Girl: Well, we spent hours lying down on our boards on the beach, then practising jumping to our feet. When we eventually tried surfing in water, the instructor kept yelling advice at me, but that was frustrating, as I could barely hear him above the noise of the others who were laughing and screaming every time they fell off. I'm pleased to say I actually managed to stay upright and catch a few waves – although I had hoped to be surfing at speed towards the shore by the end of the session. Maybe that'll come with time, because the experience certainly hasn't put me off!

Question 5 You hear part of a podcast about zebras.

Woman: Everyone knows what a zebra looks like – those beautiful black and white stripes are so distinctive. But why do they have them? Scientists have been trying to figure this out for many years. Various theories have been put forward – different stripe patterns help zebras identify each other, for example, or the stripes enable zebras to hide from predators, or they confuse insects and deter them from biting. But each time one research team claims to have found the answer, there always seems to be another one that claims to have data showing something very different. One thing we can say for sure, though, is that it's a fascinating subject to investigate.

Question 6 You hear a boy telling a friend about a trip to an outdoor sculpture exhibition.

Girl: How was your school trip?

Boy: Fantastic! We saw some outdoor sculptures. I was pretty enthusiastic when I heard some well-known artists had done them. And sculpture's tricky – I'd love to have a go, but I wouldn't know where to start.

Girl: Sounds great, although I prefer galleries.

Boy: But the outdoors was an essential part of these artworks. We went inside one sculpture – it was a huge ball with a hole in the top. We just gazed up at the changing sky – it was like a constantly shifting painting. You had to stop and focus to take it in – I realised just how necessary that is if you really want to appreciate a piece.

Question 7 You hear a boy talking to a friend about watching the same film many times.

Girl: You're not watching that old sci-fi film again?

Boy: I know, I've watched it loads of times before.

Girl: I don't understand why you insist on doing that rather than seeing something new.

Boy: Actually, I do watch a range of different films – historical, comedy, thrillers – I just tend to watch them again and again. That way I spot little things I originally missed.

Girl: I prefer wondering what's going to happen next! You can't really do that.

Boy: But what I do can be just as entertaining as being surprised by the sudden plot twists in the action films you go for. And it's good to sit quietly and enjoy something familiar.

Girl: I suppose so.

Question 8 You hear part of a radio programme about people who speak many different languages.

Man: How much is within our control? Is it about motivation, or being born in a country with several official languages, or do languages just come naturally to some people?

Woman: The short answer is, we don't know. Hyperpolyglots – people fluent in at least six languages – aren't well studied by scientists because of how rare their achievements are. Having said that, I think there has to be some sort of brain difference. Take one man from Germany, for example. He spoke more than 60 languages. When researchers compared his brain to that of the average person, they discovered significant differences in the region that's key to language learning.

That is the end of Part One.

Now look at Part Two.

PART 2 You will hear a teenager called Owen giving a presentation about his experience of learning about journalism by taking part in what is called the Young Reporter Scheme. For each question, write the correct answer. Write a word or short phrase.

You now have 45 seconds to look at Part Two.

Boy: My name's Owen, and I'd like to tell you about my experience of taking part in the Young Reporter Scheme last year. The YRS, as it's known, is a practical way of learning about journalism.

I first got interested in writing at primary school. My class produced an occasional newspaper about school news. I wrote articles about art done by pupils, and I had fun reporting on museums we visited. When my teacher told me she herself had managed to get articles published in a newspaper on the subject of travel, I thought, 'That's something I could try one day'.

Under the scheme, you write one article a month, and your articles get published on a local newspaper's website. There are training sessions on how to do various things – take notes, for example, which I found quite challenging till I got used to it, or check facts, which I found particularly useful. How to get readers' attention was another interesting session, I thought.

The YRS has certain rules. You write about local rather than national news, and some topics aren't allowed – celebrities being one, for reasons I never really grasped. I also had to keep away from politics – it can be very sensitive – and crime, which can be complicated to deal with.

My first YRS article was a report on a junior athletics competition. Seeing it on the website was quite something, though I wasn't keen on the way the page looked – there were loads of adverts surrounding my report. I now know that's common with online newspapers. But because of that, the photos I'd taken to accompany my article weren't clear, which was a shame.

After two sports reports, I tried writing profiles of local people. One was of a baker who I thought made bread-making sound fascinating. I spent a day with a firefighter, who told me incredible stories about his life – getting them down on paper was more rewarding than anything else I experienced in the YRS. I also wrote about a hospital nurse – her work was tough but very worthwhile.

I interviewed a hairdresser for another article – the newspaper wanted to feature local people who demonstrated creativity in their work and provided inspiration for young people. We talked in her salon – what struck me was her kindness – I'm not surprised her business does well, she treated everyone in such a caring way.

After that, an editor suggested I write about things that'd have a significant impact in the local area. I reported on two proposals – one for a cycle path through the town and the other for a new shopping centre. When the first of those two reports went online, it attracted hundreds of readers' comments, which I absolutely hadn't expected.

I also won a prize of two theatre tickets for a film review I wrote. I decided to share it with my sister. We had to choose what to see: a comedy show that looked likely to be entertaining, a musical, which my sister was keen on, or a play I'd studied at school. It was my sister's birthday, so I went along with her choice, but we both enjoyed it.

At the end of the year, there was a graduation ceremony for all YRS participants. Enough people attended to fill a conference centre, as my dad joked – 30 YRS students, parents, editors and the YRS organisers. There were so many of us that a lecture hall was the chosen venue for the formal event where our certificates were handed out, and after that we continued the celebrations at a large restaurant nearby.

I'm a big fan of the YRS. Besides giving me a taste of real journalism, it helped me to improve various skills. The impact on my ability to do research was especially noticeable, but it also provided me with plenty of useful practice in writing, of course.

Now you'll hear Part Two again.

That's the end of Part Two.

Now look at Part Three.

PART 3

You will hear five short extracts in which teenagers are talking about playing a violin solo at their school concert. How does each speaker feel about the piece of music they played?

For each question, choose the correct answer.

Use each answer only once. There are three extra answers which you do not need to use.

You now have 30 seconds to look at Part Three.

Speaker 1

I played my favourite violin solo at our school concert recently. It's really beautiful to listen to – it's about a bird soaring up into the sky. There's a sense of stillness about it, a longing for the countryside, and I always feel I'm expressing those feelings when I'm playing. And even though I probably wouldn't have chosen to play it in a concert, as it's quite tricky in places, I was still keen to have a go. It does let you improvise and doesn't limit you to playing exactly the notes the composer wrote. That's the thing I appreciate most about it, I'd say.

Speaker 2

I was thrilled when my teacher asked me to play a violin solo – until I realised what music she'd chosen. There were so many other pieces I'd hoped to perform – and could do way better – so that was a let-down. But I soon realised it wasn't a well-known piece, so the audience probably wouldn't notice any wrong notes! That took the pressure off, and I became keen to play it, especially as it was such a sad piece. My music teacher thought it'd help my playing, and gave me tips on the best way to approach the piece – I wasn't convinced I needed them, but it was nice of her!

Speaker 3

There was some disagreement among the orchestra about what we should play at the concert, but our teacher made good decisions. I was proud to be chosen to play the violin solo, even though I'm not the greatest player. I'm quite comfortable playing the violin – I don't easily get stressed out. But there's a huge range in the piece, and apparently even good violinists have felt discouraged about playing it, which did nothing to help my confidence! Anyway, luckily, there's a great feeling of peace to it, and that helped enormously on the day of the concert. And I'm pleased to say the audience reaction was exactly what I'd hoped for!

Speaker 4

I hadn't listened carefully to the piece before I was chosen to play it, but once I'd begun practising, I started noticing all sorts of things in it. There's a slow section that almost had me in tears when I first played it – I wasn't prepared for that – although it does end on a high. So I guess the audience appreciated that, even if it wasn't their favourite piece! I think if I'd been choosing what to play, I wouldn't have gone for it – it certainly tested my playing skills, and there's no opportunity to add your own bits to it! But I must admit, I did improve as a result of the experience.

Speaker 5

The piece of music my teacher chose for me to play was one I'd always thought was nice, though quite old-fashioned, because my grandparents always play it at home. Then I went to a concert where it was performed and realised how beautiful it was – although I've also heard people say it's quite technically difficult. I didn't really find that – that probably means I didn't notice the mistakes I made! But my focus was on trying to recreate the atmosphere I'd experienced that day at the concert – and I found that performing it actually pushed up the level of my violin skills no end. An amazing outcome!

Now you will hear Part Three again.

That is the end of Part Three.

Now look at Part Four.

PART 4

You will hear an interview with a young woman called Holly Masefield, who recently took up skydiving – jumping out of a plane with a parachute. For each question, choose the correct answer.

You now have one minute to look at Part Four.

Man: I'm with Holly Masefield, who, at the age of 16, took up skydiving – jumping out of a plane with a parachute. Holly, it's an unusual sport for someone your age! What made you take it up?

- Woman: Well, since becoming a teenager, I guess I've pursued more risky sports – things like skateboarding, windsurfing, stuff like that – so I already had a taste for those things. I'm not sure I would've even considered skydiving, though, if I hadn't bumped into a friend from primary school who'd recently given it a try, and convinced me to do the same. My initial worry was that it'd be costly, but my parents said they'd pay for my sessions as a birthday present. And when a cousin learnt of my plan, he told me about a skydiving school he'd heard good things about. So – I was ready!
- Man: Tell us about your first session.
- Woman: Because of my age, I had to do the jump attached to an instructor – 'tandem skydiving', it's called. The idea is that the instructor takes charge, and you just relax and enjoy it, with no responsibilities. Anyway, we only had a short instruction session on the ground, then boarded the plane and took off. Once we reached 10,000 feet, we jumped out, and the parachute opened almost immediately. And my instructor was keen to ensure we avoided hitting the ground too fast.
- Man: And how did you feel about having to jump with your instructor?
- Woman: I thought I'd feel irritated 'cos I just had to do exactly what he said, but then there was quite a bit to remember, so I guess I mightn't have coped with taking on even a small role during the jump. Anyway, I needn't have worried about the instructor. He was clearly very experienced – I knew I was in good hands and that was very reassuring.
- Man: You've made several jumps now. What's the key appeal for you?
- Woman: Well, when I first started, it was all about that rush of wind when the instructor opened the door. That excitement's faded a bit now and been replaced by the amazing sensation of just dropping for what seems like ages. And I always hope I'll get to enjoy the lovely scenery on the descent, too – although my attention's usually on dealing with all the equipment!
- Man: So how do people react when you tell them about your hobby?
- Woman: Actually, not many people ask why I'm so keen on it, which I must admit I've found a little strange – although maybe they can tell how enthusiastic I am about it, despite what might seem like the obvious dangers, and that just answers the question for them. In fact, once I'd told them all about it, a lot of them started seriously considering attempting it for themselves, although how many have actually done it, I don't know.
- Man: So would you say skydiving suits your personality?
- Woman: I'd always suspected I was lacking in imagination about things that could go wrong and consequently wasn't frightened of much. I have to say, though, skydiving has proved me wrong about that on a few occasions. But even when I was younger, I felt there was a world out there full of fantastic new things to try, and I was determined to do them all – skydiving seemed a good place to start. An added bonus is that I've made great friends along the way, and because of our shared interest, I suspect they'll be lifelong ones.
- Man: So what's the next stage, do you think?
- Woman: Well, apparently there'll be a chance for me to enter competitions, once I get to a certain level. At the moment, though, I'd be happy just to up my skills to the point where I could eventually do a jump with no help at all. And maybe I could join a display team one day, and entertain crowds by landing at fairs and stuff. But let's see.
- Man: Holly, thank you for talking to me today.

Now you will hear Part Four again.

That's the end of Part Four.

There will now be a pause of five minutes for you to copy your answers onto the separate answer sheet. Be sure to follow the numbering of all the questions. I'll remind you when there's one minute left, so that you are sure to finish in time.

You have one more minute left.

That's the end of the test.