An exciting discovery

A water company was doing routine work in a German river when their workers were excited to find a centuries-old ship. They consulted experts, who believe it sank during the so-called 'Hanseatic period'. At that time, several northern European cities were particularly dominant when it 1 to trade in the Baltic Sea.

Divers managed to 2 much of the ship's wooden bodywork. Laboratory tests of this wood 3 that the vessel was built in the mid-17th century. Measuring 25 metres in length, it would have been typical of the ships used to transport 4 across the Baltic. It was carrying quicklime – a chemical used in construction. A hundred and fifty barrels of this 5 were found, 70 on board and the remainder 6 across the riverbed.

So why did the ship go down? Experts believe it was probably damaged while trying to get around a sharp bend in the river. One archaeologist warns it will be lost forever unless measures are 7 to protect it. 'I really hope it can be 8 for future generations to enjoy,' he said.

Questions 9–16

For each question, write the correct answer.

Write one word for each gap.

Write your answers IN CAPITAL LETTERS on the separate answer sheet.

Language-learning apps

More and more people are turning to language apps as a way to learn new languages. They are certainly easier and quicker, 9 to mention cheaper, to access than language classes, and 10 the surface, they appear to be a good way to learn large numbers of words and phrases 11 ease. They offer a flexible approach, too. If you find 12 sitting on a train, for example, and have a few minutes to spare, you can simply open the app and get on with an exercise 13 two.

But what about the drawbacks? Some reviews suggest language apps can be inconsistent and inaccurate. Nor 14 there much feedback or explanation when you get something wrong. What is more, if you are learning a language that has many regional varieties in terms of vocabulary, it may be tricky to work out which one you are actually 15 taught. But as long as you bear in mind the potential for error with some of these apps, there's surely no harm in giving them 16 go.

Yakutsk: the world's coldest city

The Russian city of Yakutsk has about 350,000 Inhabitants. In some ways, however, it's 17 that the city exists at all. Not far from the Arctic Circle, Yakutsk is usually covered by snow and ice, and thick fog is an almost constant 18, which gives the city a 19 atmosphere. Besides being the world's coldest city, Yakutsk also has the highest 20 differences in temperature of any city on the planet. Average temperatures are -30°C for several months each year, though they can reach 30°C during the brief summer, enabling trees to grow there.

21, life in Yakutsk can be tough. The extreme conditions mean it is virtually inaccessible to the outside world for several months each year. Appropriate clothing is, therefore, an essential 22, and when temperatures are particularly low, local residents know that the best way of guaranteeing 23 and safety is to stay indoors. Despite the difficulties of living in Yakutsk, the area is rich in mineral resources, including diamonds, gold and uranium, which makes the city a relatively 24 place to live.

Part 5

Questions 31–36

Read an article about going to a special park for mountain biking. For each question, choose the correct answer.

Mark your answers on the separate answer sheet.

Mountain-bike park

Journalist and cycling fan Anna Derby tries out a new local facility.

Being a keen racing cyclist, and accustomed to whizzing round purpose-built cycling tracks at speed, I reckoned it was time I tried out something more testing to develop my skills – like a mountain-bike trail. So off I went to a new bike park and joined a group of other fairly inexperienced mountain bikers.

The bike park had been inspired by the owners' favourite ski resort, and opened as part of the region's shift away from heavy industry towards adventure sports and tourism. It had been built in a very densely wooded valley, miles from anywhere, by two 'career' mountain bikers, both well-known trail builders, making it straightforward for them to attract the investment required. The runs were divided into 'flow' and 'tech' trails: the former tended to be smoother, while the latter had more rocks and tree roots along the way. The trails were ranked for difficulty, and we were told it was possible to graduate from the hardest of one level to the easiest of the next, a gradual progression which ski resorts should seriously consider implementing.

However, instead of ski-style chair lifts, the uplift to the top of the trails, 500 metres above us, was provided by buses pulling trailers full of bikes; it took 15 minutes to reach the top, which nevertheless allowed time for four pop songs to blast out of the buses' speakers. Contrary to what we'd understood, the buses weren't yet electric, but we were assured by the guide that was the goal, so we had to be content with that.

The first trail we were taken to by our guide started with a terrifying drop off a wooden boardwalk. As on all the more advanced runs at the bike park, this was intended as a qualifier – in other words, a tricky opening feature where you can check whether you're up to it, and if not, go for an easier alternative. It was rapidly becoming apparent that I needn't have stressed about not being challenged. At the urging of some riders in the group, our guide executed a perfect display of how to ride the drop, which really dented my confidence. So I must have visibly relaxed when he then led us to another trail, still full of twists and turns, but designed to provide an altogether less intimidating introduction to downhill mountain biking.

Until now, my only experience of this kind of bike trail had been the kind of flat loops around a lake not far from the park, where I'd still managed to come off my bike and do myself serious damage. I also recall a downhill run while away on a winter holiday that felt far too white-knuckle on account of the constantly moving loose rocks, inspiring caution in even the most confident riders, some of whom subsequently fell off. But the initial run I tried at the park hit the right note. However, I still thought I'd start off by practising some of the guide's tips which, theoretically at least, would make cycling less hazardous. For example, I remembered to 'read' the trail in front of me in order to avoid any obstacles. I also compared my progress with what the other cyclists had achieved, and soon realised I wasn't the most outstanding in the group.

Snaking through the forest, over humps and around banked corners, the trail was smooth and it was easy to lose myself in it all – and become too confident as a result; at one point, I overshot the trail and ran into some trees, much to everyone's amusement. And I continually forgot to leave enough space between myself and the rider in front, so that I couldn't reach an impressive pace. I progressed then onto a slightly faster, steeper trail, although I'd have struggled even on that had it been my first run of the day. But by then I was addicted and determined to hang in there.

31 In the second paragraph, the writer reports that she was

- A impressed by one aspect of the park's organisation.
- B discouraged initially by the remote forest location.
- C interested in the motives behind the area's change of focus.
- D surprised to discover how the park had been funded.

32 When describing the journey to the trails' peak, the writer gives the impression that

- A it involved an unexpected amount of time.
- B the type of fuel used was a cause for concern.
- C the group thought it was quite innovative.
- D the transport available was inappropriate.

33 The word 'this' in bold refers to

- A the first trail.
- B a terrifying drop.
- C the advanced runs.
- D a wooden boardwalk.

34 In the fourth paragraph, the writer says she felt a sense of

- A curiosity about how it might feel to tackle risky jumps.
- B disappointment at being unable to reach a required level of skill.
- C relief when the first trail was bypassed.
- D envy over the degree of expertise demonstrated by the trainer.

35 During the initial stages of cycling on the trail, the writer

- A decided to adopt a cautious approach.
- B discovered that the advice given was impractical.
- C found it difficult to predict what lay ahead.
- D tried to resist becoming too competitive.

36 When riding through the forest, the writer

- A feared she'd failed to master one feature of the trail.
- B was tempted to give up at one stage.
- C could get completely absorbed in the activity.
- D felt she'd improved far more than she'd expected.

Part 6

Questions 37–42

Read an article about a young person who lives on a small island off the coast of Scotland. Six sentences have been removed from the text below. For each question, choose the correct answer. There is one extra sentence which you do not need to use.

Mark your answers on the separate answer sheet.

Life as a teenager on a small island

I live on a small Scottish island, often called 'isolated' and 'remote' by news reports and travel programmes. But personally, I don't connect those words with the place I call home. 37 The stretch of water in between can easily be crossed by ferry, and the larger cities like Edinburgh and Glasgow are just a short flight away. Every so often, my friends and I hop on the boat for a day of shopping and coffees before heading home to the island. The island's largest town, Stornoway, is also a thriving place, with plenty of shops and cafés of its own.

Sometimes people from mainland Scotland ask me if I know everyone on the island. 38 However, that's not the case. Having said that, I almost always bump into a friend or acquaintance when I'm out and about. You can't get anything done quickly round here!

The obvious drawback of a small community is that everyone is aware of what you're up to, and you can't get away with anything! But the flipside of that is that there's a great sense of community. 39 The friends I've got today will be lifelong, no matter where we all end up in the world after we finish school. That's a great comfort.

There's often a tendency to think that if you come from a small place that's in any way cut off from the rest of the country, it'll be old-fashioned or stuck in the past. 40 And some wonder whether this is my first time off the island or whether I feel nervous about being in a city. Of course not! What's worse is that there are those who assume people from islands have a narrow mindset or world view. Every young person I know here is well aware of what's happening in the world.

Our own culture is both traditional and kind of cool! Islanders I know are very proud of their roots. Our ancient language, Gaelic, is still widely spoken, traditional fabric is still woven, many of us practise traditional music and the local arts culture is thriving. One of my favourite things to do is visit An Lanntair, a centre that regularly hosts talks, themed film weeks, music gigs and a high-profile annual book festival. And in summer, HebCelt, the summer music festival held on the island, draws and welcomes fans from all over the world. 41

If I'm totally honest, sometimes it can be frustrating living on a small island. In winter, for example, flights and ferries to the mainland can often be cancelled because of harsh weather. 42 That affects the majority of young people like me on the island. And most of us eventually leave because there are relatively few opportunities for exciting work here. One day, I'll probably leave myself, but I'll always call this beautiful island home.

- A People look out for each other and no one ever has to feel lonely.
- B It means sometimes I don't get to see a concert or event I'd planned to go to on the mainland, but there's nothing to be done about it.
- C There's plenty of opportunity for that on a small island, no matter what age you are.
- D As far as I'm concerned, my life's pretty much the same as the one my cousins lead on the mainland.
- E We islanders know how to be hospitable!
- F It seems to be a common myth when you live somewhere relatively small that you will.
- G I've even been asked by people on the mainland whether we have electricity and Wi-Fi!

Part 7

Questions 43–52

Read a magazine article in which four people talk about their interest in drawing, and attending a drawing course held in a forest. For each question, choose the correct section. Each section may be chosen more than once.

Mark your answers on the separate answer sheet.

Drawing course in a forest

A Mina

I'd always thought I was fairly useless at drawing, but it'd never really bothered me until we moved to live near a wonderful forest. While wandering around it, I became desperate to find a way of recording the happiness I experienced, in a way that videos on my phone failed to show successfully. With that in mind, I decided I needed to just ignore any self-doubt I had and join a drawing course – and found one, actually held in the forest. We started with some exercises intended to wake up our creative brains, for example drawing with the opposite hand to the one you normally write with, and doing quick doodles of things that caught our eye. The overriding message I took away was that the standard of the finished work was irrelevant. Instead it was about becoming immersed in the processes of drawing and observation that really mattered.

B Kirstie

I've been drawing regularly since I was about ten, but recognised that I'd never been naturally brilliant at it – I'd really had to apply myself in order to improve. What I've always found really appealing, though, is just the pleasure of making marks with pencils on paper. In fact, I don't always move on to the big challenge of getting that line I've made to resemble the landscape, or whatever it is I'm trying to capture on paper. So the class I attended in the forest was just perfect – the glorious autumn colours of the trees and drawing with charcoal sticks, which is very forgiving, as errors can easily be erased or transformed into something else. And although I'd feared being distracted or becoming self-conscious due to the presence of dog walkers looking over our shoulders, I was so 'in the zone' that I wasn't aware of anything much around me.

C Josie

I really believe that when we're trying to get something down on paper, we're forced to appreciate things in more depth – to learn to observe different angles and perspectives, and to handle things with a view to understanding their composition. Under normal circumstances, we'd never devote so much attention to something as when we're drawing it, comparing this shape with that, the direction of the light, and how to make an object look 3-D on a flat piece of paper. And those are skills that can be taught, of course. So with all that in mind, I went along to a drawing course in a forest near me. I assumed the others there would be far more advanced than me, but within a short time, I'd forgotten that and was focused on differentiating between the shapes of the leaves on different species of trees – and unbelievably, I succeeded.

D Marta

Whenever I go to exhibitions of famous painters' work, I skip the big paintings in favour of looking at their preparatory drawings because they're the real eye-opener. The degree of movement and emotion captured in them leaves me speechless – and, of course, slightly discouraged, as I know I'll never reach that standard! However, when I joined a group of other people on a drawing course in the forest, I still had high hopes for an amazing breakthrough in my drawing. I selected one tree to draw – my favourite because of its rough bark and the crazy angles of its branches. I made a real effort to show the texture and shading of the trunk and the leaves around it, and even remembered a few drawing techniques from previous classes I'd attended. It wasn't the most brilliant picture ever, but I was quite pleased with it!

Which person

admits to being optimistic about the progress she'd make on the course?	43
surprised herself at how quickly she started drawing accurately?	44
began to understand what the priorities were when drawing?	45
appreciated the fact that the materials she used allowed her to alter her work?	46
found that certain skills she had come back to her on the course?	47
was sufficiently focused on her drawing not to be disturbed by other people?	48
had to overcome negative feelings about her skills before attending?	49
doubted whether she would achieve very much on the course?	50
enjoys the process of using drawing materials without necessarily having a goal?	51
generally finds herself more impressed by one type of artwork than another?	52
